ISLANDS

The overriding feeling of Island whiskies is marine. From Arran, past Islay, and right up to the Orkney's, they're often highly peated, smoky, and medicinal, but almost always salty. Islands are like 'baby Islays' – shared character but not as bullish.

ISLAY

Pre-industrial revolution, whisky distilleries would burn peat. Change led to the use of hot air instead. But not on Islay, home of Scotland's biggest flavoured whiskies. Highly distinctive medicinal, smoky, and earthy flavours. Often nautical in style, giving a salt and pepper vibe. The Marmite of whisky, maybe love, maybe hate... But they're a must try.

BOWMORE 12 (40%)
Flowers, fruit, smoke, potpourri, perfume and honey. Fresh, hint of peat smoke. Not for the faint-hearted.

5.00

LAPHROAIG 10 (40%)

5.00

Ash, tobacco and a hint of the sea. Surprisingly sweet, salty, medicinal, thick smoke, seaweed, surf and turf and fresh sea air.

SCOTCH

HIGHLANDS

The sheer scale of the highlands, and volume of distilleries results in a broad range of styles. Under duress, you could attempt to generalise them as often fruity, with some notes of toffee and fudge. Sometimes smoke and occasional spice. Highland falls neatly between Speyside and Islay – not overpowering, but often big. An excellent grounding for those building up to Islay and the Islands.

JAPANESE

Japanese whisky heritage comes from Scotland, with a similar variation from distillery to distillery. Early producers would even import their malt from Scotland and the ways in which the whiskies are produced, continue to uphold Scottish tradition. Japan has been producing for almost 100 years, and each Japanese distillery has a unique style. It's ten or so distilleries boast everything from light, almost Speyside-like tipples, to big, bold smoky drams.
